Bush's favor. Further, the courts have interpreted the word "person" to include corporations. Although the 14th Amendment was intended to protect the rights of formerly enslaved people, it has continued to play a major role in constitutional politics to this day. In response to the Emancipation Proclamation and the 13th Amendment, many Southern states enacted laws known as Black Codes designed to continue to deny African Americans certain rights and privileges enjoyed by white citizens. The section was intended to prevent former Confederate military officers and politicians from holding federal offices. The Privileges and Immunities Clause states "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." In the Slaughter-House Cases (1873), the Supreme Court recognized a difference between a person's rights as a U.S. citizen and their rights under state law. Bush v. The Due Process Clause says no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Although this clause was intended to apply to professional contracts and transactions, over time it has become most closely cited in right-to-privacy cases. This became a point of contention between Congress and Southern leaders. The 14th Amendment. The 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution deals with several aspects of U.S. citizenship and the rights of citizens. U.S. National Archives Connecticut was the first state to ratify the 14th Amendment on June 30, 1866. As a result, corporations are also protected by "due process" along with being granted "equal protection." While there were other clauses in the amendment, none were as significant as these. Notable Supreme Court cases that have turned on this issue include *Griswold v. During the next two years, 28 states would ratify the amendment, although not without incident. Wong Kim Ark (1898) which affirmed the citizenship of U.S.-born children of legal immigrants. The Citizenship Clause overrules the 1875 Supreme Court Dred Scott decision that formerly enslaved African Americans were not citizens, could not become citizens, and thus could never enjoy the benefits and protections of citizenship. Updated by Robert Longley Baer, Judith A. With its passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, Congress attempted to bolster the 14th Amendment. It also guarantees all Americans their constitutional rights and prohibits the states from passing laws limiting those rights. Connecticut (1965), which overturned a Connecticut ban on the sale of contraception; *Roe v. This key ruling opened the door for a number of significant civil rights and affirmative action court cases. Section Four addresses the federal debt by confirming that neither the United States nor any state could be forced to pay for lost enslaved Black Americans or debts that had been incurred by the Confederacy as a result of their participation in the Civil War. Section Five, also known as the Enforcement Clause, grants Congress the power to pass "appropriate legislation" as necessary to enforce all of the amendment's other clauses and provisions. Board of Education (1954) that the Supreme Court would revisit this opinion, ultimately ruling that separate facilities were, in fact, unconstitutional. Johnson, a Tennessee Democrat and staunch supporter of states' rights, had clashed repeatedly with the Republican-controlled Congress. Hodges (2015), which held that same-sex marriages deserved federal recognition. In *McDonald v. Of the three Reconstruction amendments, the 14th is the most complicated and the one that has had the more unforeseen effects. The 14th Amendment contains five sections, of which the first contains the most impactful provisions. Section One guarantees all rights and privileges of citizenship to any and all persons born or naturalized in the United States. Also known as the "Enforcement Act," the 1875 Act guaranteed all citizens, regardless of race or color, equal access to public accommodations and transportation, and made it illegal to exempt them from serving on juries. "The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine." Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1988 Info Explore key historical documents that inspired the Framers of the Constitution and each amendment during the drafting process, the early drafts and major proposals behind each provision, and discover how the drafters deliberated, agreed and disagreed, on the path to compromise and the final text. The ruling held that state laws could not impede a person's federal rights. Its broad goal was to reinforce the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which ensured that "all persons born in the United States" were citizens and were to be given "full and equal benefit of all laws." The Civil Rights Act of 1866 protected the "civil" rights of all citizens, such as the right to sue, make contracts, and buy and sell property. Fearing President Johnson and Southern politicians would attempt to undo the protections of the Civil Rights Act, Republican congressional leaders began work on what would become the 14th Amendment. Congress had intentionally omitted those protections in hopes of averting the bill's veto by President Andrew Johnson (1808-1875). The Citizenship Clause states that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." This clause played an important role in two Supreme Court cases: *Elk v. It wouldn't be until *Brown v. Section Three forbids anyone who participates or has participated in "insurrection or rebellion" against the United States from holding any elected or appointed federal office. Ferguson (1898) the Supreme Court ruled that Southern states could enforce racial segregation as long as "separate but equal" facilities existed for Black and white Americans. Ratified on July 9, 1868, during the post-Civil War era, the 14th, along with the 13th and 15th Amendments, are collectively known as the Reconstruction Amendments. Wade (1973), which overturned a Texas ban on abortion and lifted many restrictions on the practice nationwide; and *Obergefell v. In the South, Louisiana and North and South Carolina refused initially to ratify the amendment. Chicago (2010), which overturned a Chicago ban on handguns. Justice Clarence Thomas cited this clause in his opinion supporting the ruling. When the Civil Rights Act landed on President Johnson's desk, he fulfilled his promise to veto it. The Equal Protection Clause prevents states from denying "to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The clause has become most closely associated with civil rights cases, particularly for African Americans. "Equality Under the Constitution: Reclaiming the Fourteenth Amendment." Ithaca NY: Cornell University Press, 1983. Lash, Kurt T. Coming Soon Gore (2001) also touched on the equal protection clause when a majority of justices ruled that the partial recount of presidential votes in Florida was unconstitutional because it was not being conducted the same way in all contested locations. In addition, African Americans could be jailed for not being able to repay their debts, leading to racially-discriminating labor practices like the leasing of convicts to private businesses. Over time, numerous lawsuits have arisen that have referenced the 14th Amendment. Legislatures in Ohio and New Jersey both rescinded their states' pro-amendment votes. Wilkins (1884) which addressed citizenship rights of indigenous peoples, and United States v. Prior to this, African Americans had been under-counted when apportioning representation. Congress, in turn, overrode the veto and the measure became law. In Plessy v. However, it failed to protect "political" rights, like the right to vote and hold office, or "social" rights guaranteeing equal access to schools and other public accommodations. Nevertheless, the 14th Amendment was declared formally ratified on July 28, 1868. The fact that the amendment uses the word "state" in the Privileges and Immunities Clause—along with interpretation of the Due Process Clause—has meant state power and federal power are both subject to the Bill of Rights. The section also guaranteed the right to vote to all male citizens age 21 years or older. Lastly, it ensures that no citizen's right to "life, liberty, or property" will be denied without due process of law. In 1883, however, the U.S. Supreme Court, in its Civil Rights Cases decisions, overturned the public accommodation sections of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 and declared that the 14th Amendment did not give Congress the power to dictate the affairs of private businesses. As a result of the Civil Rights Cases, while African Americans had been declared legally "free" U.S. citizens by the 14th Amendment, they continue to face discrimination in society, economics, and politics into the 21st century. The four clauses of the first section of the 14th Amendment are the most important because they have repeatedly been cited in major Supreme Court cases concerning civil rights, presidential politics and the right to privacy. After clearing Congress in June of 1866, the 14th Amendment went to the states for ratification. Section Two specifies that the process of apportionment used to fairly distribute seats in the U.S. House of Representatives among the states must be based on the whole population, including formerly enslaved African Americans. Under the states' Black Codes, recently freed, formerly enslaved Black Americans were not allowed to travel widely, own certain types of property, or sue in court. "The Fourteenth Amendment and the Privileges and Immunities of American Citizenship." Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, 2014.Nelson, William E. As a condition for readmittance to the Union, the former Confederate states were required to approve the amendment. The decision essentially decided the 2000 presidential election in George W.
